CHALLENGE

With over a trillion brain cells that continually reconfigure to form new memories and purge old ones, a properly functioning brain surpasses the best computer in efficiently storing and retrieving information. These brain cells, called neurons, transport a vast amount of information within the cerebral cortex of the brain and are critical to brain health. But as we grow older, these vital neurons naturally lose their function. Although age-related cognitive decline or memory impairment is a common condition, it is not inevitable. In fact, through eating right, exercising, staying mentally active, and ensuring that you're getting the right dietary components, one can enhance memory function and support optimal brain health.
